

ENGLISH BULLDOG

An English bulldog is often called as British Bulldog or just simply "bulldog". It is typically described as wrinkled by the first sight because it has a thick skin that crease in its brows as well as from its nose down on its cheeks and neck. Its ears are small and are placed arose on top of its head. The tail is either a little twisted or straight. Colors are usually pale red or white or a combination of both and sometimes tawny beige or soft yellow. Its weight scales from 50-55 pounds and its height ranges from about 31- 40 centimeters. English bulldogs are sometimes mistaken to be American Bulldog because of its similarities in physical features.

The English bulldog's wrinkled and courageous appearance makes it look like to be daunting but essentially it has a good temperament and is really is calm when not being finding a reason to be angry. It is often considered as an indoor pet since it does not move a lot inside but can stir a little bit when taken out for a walk outside. It has actually become a family pet because it can be reliable in times when security is needed and can also be gentle when being played with even with children. It is inclined into drawing people's interests or attention and constantly seeks affection and is very loyal to its owner. Companionship is one of the greatest behaviors that an English Bulldog could offer to its owner.

It is often described as lazy since it does rarely exercise which most of the time causes it to loose its strength in a shorter time compared to other breeds. It is also considered to be one of lowest degree of dogs on the terms of obedience or intelligence. It is messy because they are chewing excessively longer than they need to so owners are expected to be diligent in cleaning if they own a pet like this. It has several health problems such as that in breathing, has poor eyesight and very sensitive of colds. It is also prone of having skin infections and arthritis. Even though it has more health problems than other dogs, its health can be very good when it is closely observed.

Although people are usually misled of the outward impression that English Bulldogs possess, owners can confess that it could be the best pet that one could have in terms of great companionship.
